Testimony of Experts.

GENEVA, Jan. 11th, 1882.

The insanity of Addie Curtis. Mr. Editor, you will perhaps recollect that at our interview, in October last, you expressed your willingness that I should have the use of the columns of your excellent paper to make one more reply to several articles that have appeared in the REGISTER stigmatizing and misrepresenting the agency I had, and the course I had taken between the Congregationalist Church of this place and Alroy Curtis, one of its members, in relation to the support of his sister Addie. I then expressed to you the opinion that what I had stated in my previous communication ought to be sufficient to correct whatever wrong impressions those articles had made, and at I did not wish to have any controversy with your very courteous correspondent "N." I had decided to let the matter rest. I find, however, that these impressions were not fully corrected, and as the case has some aspects of peculiar interest and as many persons are desirous of a fuller knowledge of the nature and manifestations of Addie's insanity, I have finally decided to avail myself of your kind offer only regretting that my article must necessarily be somewhat lengthy but promising to make it as brief as I can.

Not the first, but among the first unmistakable indications of her insanity were expressions and manifestations of fear and alarm, because, as she believed and strenuously and persistently affirmed, Dr. Knowlton was coming to cut her all to pieces. No reasoning could convince her to the contrary. She "heard them," she said, "talking it over out on the door-step; she demanded that all the doors and windows should be fastened, and evidently spent a sleepless night in great fear. And so day after day till about the fifth day, when the terror would seem to subside into a kind of vague fear and, excepting an occasional exclamation of "I hear them! I hear them!" she would seem, for awhile to be much like herself. The time referred to above was some four or five years ago. From that time on these insane periods have recurred at intervals varying from four to six weeks or more lasting from four days to a week. Sometimes during these periods it is impossible to persuade her to persuade her to go to bed at night, or to lie down and get sleep during the day, until nature's demand for sleep overpowers her volition and she is compelled to sleep volens nolens. The imaginary agents who are going to perpetrate these imaginary deeds are not always the same, nor the deeds themselves. Sometimes it is Dr. Knowlton, sometimes it is Dr. Frosting (we have never been able to make out who Dr. Frosting is) sometimes it is simply "they." During her insane fits she comes into our room several times during the night calling out that she is afraid. When asked what she is afraid of she would say, "They are coming to cut my hands and feet off," or to cut her tongue out or to make way with her. When assured that there is no one to hurt her at all she will affirm pointedly that there is somebody around, and declares that she has heard them talking, plotting to do it. One day about the first of last July we heard her out in the corn field preaching to or haranguing an imaginary audience, as her mother ascertained by approaching near her unperceived. We did not interfere with her proceeding and she continued her speech about one hour and forty minutes. The next day she was at it again at an earlier hour, and continued her talk about two hours. Her mother (my wife) became concerned about her fearing that such exposure and exercise in the hot sun would be an injury to her. Hoping that by getting her mind and thoughts off her imaginary dangers her mental sufferings might be lessened I persuaded my wife to let her have her own way till some signs of injury should be apparent. She lectured about four hours that day without seeming to experience any injurious effects. We therefore let her have her way unmolested. She afterwards fixed herself up a platform and stand nearer the house and continued to extend the time of her performances till finally she would occupy most of the day, going directly to her stand when she arose in the morning continuing with incredible endurance her harangue without very much intermission till between nine and ten o'clock at night, even refusing when called to adjourn sooner to give us a chance to sleep. She continued this practice uninterrupted about five months to the apparent benefit of her health; and I am satisfied also greatly to the mitigation of her mental sufferings. Her insanity became less fitful and violent, though I was sorry to find not less constant. Her audience was a multitude of pictures which she hung upon the trees before her, and burden of her speeches, day after day and week after week, was to persuade her hearers to enlist in the Union army and fight against the Rebels. Till long after the weather had become too cold to make it prudent to be out she continued these exercises despite all efforts to dissuade her from it, and finally was compelled to give it up. During this time not a day passed, I think, without her giving expression during the suspension of other exercises to the most absurd and sometimes ludicrous fears; yet when talking she seemed to forget her supposed danger.

After she relinquished this practice her insanity resumed its former characteristics. A short time afterward she came down from her room, in the morning, in high dudgeon because, as she said, Alroy and his wife had been up all night cutting up her shawls and dresses. She would not be cajoled to the contrary—she heard them doing it; threatened that she would take the law on them; charged them of all manner of absurd things and kept up her resentful tirade through much of the day, spurning all efforts to quiet her. She was heard up frequently during the following night and it was not known whether she slept at all. The next day and night a similar scene was enacted; the only thing changed was that Alroy was going to put a cow in her bed room. It was certainly so—she had heard them talking about it all night. The next morning, Dec. 27th, she came down with that old look of wildness and terror which we had so often seen before, and calling her mother into another room told her that "they were coming to beat her brains out. Her mother tried her best to quiet her, but we all saw what was coming. To describe the experiences and events of the next three days and nights would make my article too long; suffice it to say every effort was made to keep her quiet with only partial success. She seemed in constant fear of being butchered and I do not think she went to bed at all during that time; she was either moving about in her own room or coming down into ours. She could not be persuaded to undress and lie down. The last time, I think, that she came to our room during the night of Dec. 29th she had a lamp in her hand, and the look of consternation which I saw depicted on her face could hardly be exceeded by that of a person who momentarily expected to be massacred. The next day she could neither keep awake nor be persuaded to lay down and get some sleep. At night, however, the demand of the body triumphed and she seemed to have a night of uninterrupted sleep, giving us a chance also to obtain much needed rest. The next morning, Dec. 31st, she seemed much better. The story that her friends ever treated her "shamefully" or even unkindly is without any foundation or excuse.

I have been thus circumstantial and particular in this account, Mr. Editor, because I wish to have it borne in mind that only three days after the occurrence of the events here narrated quite a number of our fair minded citizens went before the Board of Commissioners and testified that in their candid, unprejudiced (?) opinion Addie is not insane but only idiotic, and that if she has recently exhibited any marked symptoms of insanity it is the result of being trained to it. A more false and malicious statement than this has seldom been uttered, and it clearly reveals the animus, and shows the unscrupulousness of this whole movement against Alroy. I also wish to have it borne in mind that these witnesses are persons whose extraordinary powers of judging have enabled them to form these mighty and reliable opinions respecting Addie without ever having been in the house where she was, since she became insane; and without having seen her but a few times and that only during her lucid intervals. Remarkable men! How fortunate that their own business does not engross their time and energies as to leave them no time and ability to assist in the affairs of their neighbors.

E. FISK.

Supreme Court Decisions.
As a matter of general news we publish below the syllabi of the Supreme Court in the "land league" cases:
Joseph Neer vs. J. P. Williams.
Error from Allen County.
AFFIRMED.
BY THE COURT. BREWER, J.
1. Under the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, 10 U. S. Statutes at Large, 722, lands not within the grant in public, but within the limits of the insolvency strip, were not conveyed by a deed not to be conveyed to the L. L. & C. R. Co., one of the beneficiaries in said act, or sold for its benefit until the completion of the entire road and branches, and Congress in 1870, by resolution (19 U. S. Statutes at Large, 107), formally declared a forfeiture of all unexpired lands. Held, that such lands were from all rights or claims arising under said grant, and that a state thereof from the Government of the "stat," executed more than ten years after the date of the act, passed no title.
2. The grant in aid of the branch of the Atchafalaya, T. & Santa Fe Railroad Company was only of lands on either side and did not extend beyond the termini of the branch. The lands where the L. & A. Lawrence & Salveston Railroad entered the Neosho Valley and lands on the east of said last named railroad were not within the terms of the grant by this branch, and never could have been selected therefor even if the branch had been built.
3. Lands within the insolvency limits named in the act of March 3, 1853, never having been prior to the act of Congress of July 26th, 1866, 14 U. S. Statutes at Large, 130. Reserved by competent authority for the purpose of aiding in an object of interest important, never fell within the terms of the grant in said last named act.
All the Justices concurring.

Bernard Rooken vs. John Alderman.
Error from Allen County.
REVERSED.
BY THE COURT. VALENTINE, J.
In an action of ejectment brought by a grantee of the original owner of the land, it was shown that the defendant held under a contract with the original owner of the land, which contract stipulated in substance, among other things, that time should be of the essence of the contract, that any failure on the part of the person holding under the contract in making payments of the purchase money or taxes due on the land should render the contract utterly null and void; that by such failure the party holding under the contract should forfeit to the other party all his movements made on the premises and all right to compensation therefor; and that he should cease to have any interest therein. The party holding under the contract failed to make the payments of purchase money and taxes due on the land for several years, and there was no evidence tending to show that he ever tendered the amount of such purchases money or taxes, or was willing to pay the same. Held, that such person has no right to the benefit of the occupying claimant act.
All the Justices concurring.

Judge Talcott left here yesterday morning for Erie to convene the adjourned term of district court. The "chicken pox" has not disfigured his personal appearance in the least, and he is just as good natured and gentlemanly as ever. Some of the judicial districts of the State may have a larger amount of avoidable delays on the "bench" than the 7th district, but we doubt if there is one with a clearer head or better heart.—Osage Mission Journal.
